MEMORANDUM OPINION

GÓMEZ, J.

Before the Court is the motion of David J. Haddow ("Haddow") for a judgment of acquittal¹ pursuant to Rule 29 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Haddow asserts that the government failed to identify him as the David Haddow named in the indictment.

The issue presented here merits special attention. The Court must decide the question of the quantum and quality of circumstantial evidence that is sufficient to permit a jury to infer that a defendant has been identified.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Hansel Bailey ("Bailey") managed Compass Diversified ("Compass"), a business incorporated in the U.S. Virgin Islands in 2004. Compass was a business management and consulting firm. Compass marketed a tax plan that would allow its clients in California to claim business deductions on their income tax returns by making payments to Compass. The scheme consisted of a three-stage money flow. First, Compass clients would make payments to Compass. A Compass employee would deposit that money into Compass's bank account. Second, a Compass employee would transfer a portion of the money in Compass's account by check to another bank account controlled by a Compass employee and held in the employee's name. Finally, Compass would return money from the employee's account to the Compass clients.

Bailey recruited Dwight Padilla, a tax preparer with existing tax clients, to recruit those existing tax clients to work with Compass. Bailey also hired David Haddow ("Haddow") to be the chief operations officer of Compass, who would run the business.

Memo. Op.

Haddow recommended that Bailey hire Laura Cates ("Cates") as a consultant. Haddow collected money from Compass clients and gave it to Jeanna Boschulte ("Boschulte"), an employee of Compass. Boschulte then returned the money to the clients who sent it to Compass. Jason Questel ("Questel") was the accountant for Compass. Jennifer Skipper was also employed as a junior consultant at Compass. In 2006, five employees worked for Compass at its location in Buccaneer Mall on Saint Thomas, United States Virgin Islands: Haddow, Cates, Boschulte, Questel, and Skipper.

To promote the economic development of the Virgin Islands, the Virgin Islands provides a tax credit for qualifying Virgin Islands businesses. See generally V.I. CODE ANN. tit. 29, § 701. A company may be eligible for this tax credit when it meets certain requirements, such as employing a minimum number of Virgin Islands residents, providing delineated products or services, and investing a minimum of $100,000 in the qualifying business. See V.I. CODE ANN. 29, § 708. That tax incentive program is referred to as the "economic development commission program," or "EDC program." Compass Diversified claimed an economic development tax credit in tax year 2004 in the amount of $213,000. Compass Diversified claimed an economic development tax credit in tax year 2005 in the amount of $700,000.

Compass closed in October, 2007.

On December 6, 2012, a grand jury returned a two-count indictment against defendants Hansel Bailey ("Bailey") and David Haddow ("Haddow")(collectively, "the defendants"). The Indictment alleges that, among other things: (1) the defendants conspired to defraud the United States for the purpose of defeating the Internal Revenue Service in the computation and collection of taxes, in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371; and (2) the defendants conspired to evade a large part of the income tax due and owing to the United States Virgin Islands, in violation of 33 V.I.C. § 1522.

On December 17, 2012, Attorney Treston Moore entered his appearance on behalf of Haddow.

Trial began on July 8, 2013. On that date, after the jury panel was sworn, Attorney Moore, introduced himself and his client to the jury.

MR. MOORE: Good morning, ladies and gentlemen.
My name is Treston Moore. I'm from the law firm of Moore, Dodson and Russell. My partners are J. Daryl Dodson and Charles Steve Russell. And this is my client, Mr. David J. Haddow.

July 8, 2013, Trial Tr. at 9-10.

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

In his opening statement, Attorney Moore referred to Haddow as "my client":

MR. MOORE: Good morning, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, co-counsel, my client, and co-defense counsel. Ladies and gentlemen, I've introduced myself previously. I'm Treston Moore. I am entirely honored to represent my client, Mr. David Haddow. . . .

July 8, 2013, Trial Tr. at 75.

The government presented testimony from thirteen witnesses. The first, Jeanna Boschulte, was employed by Compass as a community outreach coordinator/gifter. (July 8, 2013, Trial Tr. at 88.) Boschulte testified that her job was to go out in the community to see what nonprofit organizations, such as the Boys and Girls Club, schools, or a Little League team, might have need for monetary donations. Boschulte identified approximately three or four worthy organizations. Bailey and Haddow responded that they would be able to make a monetary donation to those organizations at a later date. No donation was ever made to a charitable organization that Boschulte identified.

Boschulte also testified that she opened a FirstBank account at Compass's direction in her own name, ostensibly for the purpose of making donations to charitable organizations from Compass. Boschulte would receive a check made out to her from the Company. She would then deposit that check into her FirstBank account. These deposits included a $57,500 check dated

Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

November 30, 2005, and a $55,100 check dated on or about December 14, 2005. (Trial Tr. at 105-108.) Boschulte testified that she would wait for the check to clear, then notify Haddow and Bailey. Then she would receive further instructions. Specifically, Haddow or Questel would give Boschulte information about an individual and the amount to be transferred. Boschulte would then go to the bank and wire the money to that individual. Boschulte would then create a receipt for a wire transfer. Subsequently, Boschulte testified that she was directed to open another bank account in her name for Compass at Scotia Bank.

At no time during Boschulte's testimony was she asked to identify David Haddow.

The second witness, Jack D'Angelo, owns a business that invested in Compass. (July 8, 2013, Trial Tr. at 214.) D'Angelo testified that Padilla, his tax preparer, introduced him to Bailey. D'Angelo testified that he did not recall any conversations with Bailey about Compass's services. D'Angelo testified that a person from Compass asked him for $120,000, but does not remember the name of that person. At no time during D'Angelo's testimony was he asked to identify David Haddow, nor did D'Angelo refer to Haddow.

The third witness, Percival Clouden, testified that he has been the chief executive officer, sometimes called the executive

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

director, at the Economic Development Authority, since 2007.

(July 8, 2013, Trial Tr. at 255.) Clouden further testified that he oversees the Economic Development Commission ("EDC"). Clouden testified that the EDC invites companies to do business in the territory under the tax incentive program. Clouden testified as to the steps in the tax incentive program application process. Clouden testified that there is "frequent communication" between the applicant and the EDC. Clouden testified that he was not with the Economic Development Agency as of 2004. Clouden did not personally research Compass. Clouden testified that Compass was committed to contribute $50,000 each year into the local community, with a 5% increase each year. Additionally, Compass was committed to allocate $25,000 to an employee to monitor those contributions. At no time during Clouden's testimony was he asked to identify David Haddow.

The fourth witness, Marcella Sommersall, testified that she is a disclosure officer at the Government of the Virgin Islands, Internal Revenue Bureau. (July 9, 2013, Trial. Tr. at 5.) Sommersall testified that she reviewed the tax returns Compass filed. Somersall further testified that she did not find Compass's name on the list of applicants who had been granted the tax credit benefits. Somersall also testified that she did not find a certificate for the credit Compass had taken.

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

Somersall testified that David J. Haddow's signature appeared on several documents. At no time during Somersall's testimony was she asked to identify David Haddow.

The fifth witness, Jason Questel, testified that he began working at Compass in February, 2006, as an accountant. (July 9, 2013, Trial. Tr. at 31.) Questel testified that he learned about the position at Compass from an individual he referred to as "Mr. Haddow." (July 9, Trial Tr. 31:16.) Questel stated that "Mr. Haddow" and "Mr. Bailey" interviewed him for the job at Compass. (Id. 32:9-12.) Questel described the gift program, Compass's various bank accounts, Compass's oil and gas venture investment, and Questel's job responsibilities as accountant. Questel explained that the checks going out from Compass were signed by Haddow. Questel testified that he discussed the circular flow of funds with Haddow. Questel subsequently testified that he talked to Haddow to properly account for client activity. Questel further testified that certain invoicing did not match payments received, and brought this concern to Haddow's attention. Questel also testified that he attended a meeting with Haddow in 2006 on St. Thomas to review client invoices. Questel further testified as to a conference call with Haddow and Padilla. Accounting spreadsheets and documents tracking client activity were admitted into evidence.

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

At no time during Questel's testimony was he asked to identify David Haddow.

The sixth witness, Laura Cates ("Cates"), testified that she was a Virgin Islands employee of Compass. She began her employment in November, 2005. (July 9, 2013, Trial. Tr. at 114.). Cates testified that she interviewed twice with someone she referred to as "Dave Haddow" before beginning employment. (July 9, 2013, Trial Tr. 116:4.) Cates testified as to her job responsibilities. Cates testified that "Dave and I would spend a lot of time researching or vetting [projects]." (July 9, 2013, Trial. Tr. 123:11-13.) When asked who was involved in evaluating ideas, Cates answered "Dave and I." (July 9, 2013, Trial. Tr. 124:18.)

On cross-examination, Attorney Moore introduced himself to Cates:

A. Good afternoon.

Q. I'm Treston Moore. I spoke with you. But I represent David Haddow.

(July 9, 2013, Trial Tr. 131:24-25, 132:1).

Attorney Moore showed Cates Defendant's Exhibit 68. Cates identified the document as a newsletter from the summer of 2006 sent by Compass Diversified to its clients. (July 9, 2013, Trial Tr. 141:2-14.) Attorney Moore then moved Defendant's Exhibit 68 into evidence. Subsequently, Cates stated that she "helped Dave"

Memo. Op.

to arrange negotiations and phone calls. (July 9, 2013, Trial Tr. at 156.) At no time during Cates's testimony was she asked to identify David Haddow.

The seventh witness, Anastasia Howard, is a real estate agent and was a client of Padilla. (July 9, 2013, Trial Tr. at 164.) Padilla referred Howard to Compass as a tax savings plan. Howard ultimately invested in Compass. Howard testified that someone she referred to as "Dave Haddow" contacted her "via e-mail and telephone" to go over payments and wiring instructions. (July 9, 2013, Trial Tr. 169:4-5.) An invoice from Compass to Howard was admitted into evidence. Howard testified that Haddow made phone calls to press for dates to commit to making payments. Howard further testified about e-mails from Haddow. Howard stated that she had never met Haddow in person. At no time during Howard's testimony was she asked to identify David Haddow.

The eighth witness, Brian Faris, testified that he was previously a realtor and a client of Padilla. (July 9, 2013, Trial Tr. at 212-213.) Padilla presented Compass to Faris as a way to reduce tax liability. Faris decided to use the services of Compass. Faris testified that he received a number of e-mails from an individual he referred to as "David Haddow." (Id.

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

216:11-14.) At no time during Faris's testimony was he asked to identify David Haddow.

The ninth witness, Victoria O'Brien, is a court witness coordinator for the Internal Revenue Service. (July 9, 2013, Trial. Tr. at 240.) O'Brien testified about IRS records. At no time during O'Brien's testimony was she asked to identify David Haddow.

The tenth witness, Dwight Padilla, was a tax preparer who worked at Compass. (July 9, 2013, Trial. Tr. at 261; July 10, 2013, Trial Tr. at 4.) Padilla testified that he knew a person by the name of David Haddow:

Q. Are you familiar with an individual by the name of David Haddow?

A. Yes, I am.

Q. And who is Mr. Haddow?

A. Mr. Haddow was an employee of Compass Diversified.

(July 9, 2013, Trial. Tr. at 328:14-18.) Padilla further testified to conversations he and Haddow had, as well as to meetings with the Compass staff in the Virgin Islands. At no time during Padilla's testimony was he asked to identify David Haddow.

The eleventh witness, Bernhard Braunwalder, testified that he is involved in a fire protection business. (July 10, 2013, Trial Tr. at 77.) Padilla introduced Braunwalder to Bailey for investment purposes in 1998. Braunwalder heard about Compass

Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

from Bailey and Padilla. Padilla recommended seeking a tax break by investing in a Virgin Islands business. Braunwalder testified as to the mechanics of his dealings with Compass. At no time during Braunwalder's testimony was he asked to identify David Haddow.

The twelfth witness, Timothy Adkins, testified that he hired Compass for consulting services (July 10, 2013, Trial Tr. at 98.). Bailey introduced Adkins to Padilla. Bailey lent money to Bailey at the end of 2006. At no time during Adkins's testimony was he asked to identify David Haddow.

The thirteenth and final witness, Richard Sherman, and his wife operate a therapy treatment business. (July 10, 2013, Trial Tr. at 186.) Sherman testified that he and his wife tried to obtain consulting services for their therapy business from Compass. At no time during Sherman's testimony was he asked to identify David Haddow.

At the close of the Government's case-in-chief, Haddow moved for a judgment of acquittal. Haddow alleged that the government failed to identify the Haddow seated in the courtroom as the Haddow who allegedly committed the offenses. (July 10, 2013, Trial Tr. at 212-68.) The Government conceded that there was no direct evidence identifying Haddow. The Court took the

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

motion under advisement, noting that there appeared to be no circumstantial evidence identifying Haddow.

The defendants did not present any evidence or witnesses.

In his closing statement, Attorney Moore again referred to his client: "It's been my honor to represent Mr. Haddow throughout this ordeal." July 11, 2013, Trial Tr. at 51.

On July 11, 2013, the jury convicted Haddow of one count of conspiracy to defraud the United States in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 371, and one count of conspiracy to evade or defeat tax in violation of 33 V.I.C. § 1522.

II. DISCUSSION

A judgment of acquittal is appropriate under Rule 29 if, after reviewing the record in a light most favorable to the prosecution, the Court determines that no rational jury could find proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. United States v. Bobb, 471 F.3d 491, 494 (3d Cir. 2006); see also United States v. Smith, 294 F.3d 473, 476 (3d Cir. 2002) (district court must "'review the record in the light most favorable to the prosecution to determine whether any rational trier of fact could have found proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt based on the available evidence.'") (quoting United States v. Wolfe, 245 F.3d 257, 262 (3d Cir. 2001)).

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

An insufficiency finding should be “‘confined to cases where the prosecution’s failure is clear.’” Smith, 294 F.3d at 477 (quoting United States v. Leon, 739 F.2d 885, 891 (3d Cir. 1984)). “Courts must be ever vigilant in the context of [Rule] 29 not to usurp the role of the jury by weighing credibility and assigning weight to the evidence, or by substituting its judgment for that of the jury.” United States v. Brodie, 403 F.3d 123, 133 (3d Cir. 2005) (citations omitted); see also United States v. Ashfield, 735 F.2d 101, 106 (3d Cir. 1984) (“Our task is not to decide what we would conclude had we been the finders of fact; instead, we are limited to determining whether the conclusion chosen by the fact finders was permissible.”).

The government may sustain its burden entirely through circumstantial evidence. Bobb, 471 F.3d at 494; see also United States v. Wexler, 838 F.2d 88, 90 (3d Cir. 1988). A motion for acquittal should be granted when there is a “total absence of evidence that [the] defendant had any connection” with the crimes alleged and proved. United States v. Darrell, 629 F. 2d 1089, 1091 (5th Cir. 1980) (conviction reversed with directions to enter judgment of acquittal in mail fraud case, noting there was little Fifth Circuit precedent saying what evidence would permit an inference of the defendant’s identity).

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

III. ANALYSIS

Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the government, the Court must determine whether any rational jury could find beyond a reasonable doubt that the Haddow seated in the courtroom was the same Haddow named in the indictment. Unless the defendant chooses to admit participation in the act, identification is an element which the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt. United States v. Wilford, 493 F.2d 730, 735 fn. 9 (3d Cir. 1974). "A witness need not physically point out a defendant so long as the evidence is sufficient to permit the inference that the person on trial was the person who committed the crime." United States v. Taylor, 900 F.2d 779, 782 (4th Cir. 1990).

This case thus presents this Court with the issue of whether the evidence in this case is sufficient to permit the inference that the person on trial was the person who committed the crime. In order to answer that question, the Court must assess the information from which a jury may draw permissible inferences.

There is no consensus in the caselaw that delineates or defines the essential elements, including the quantum and quality of circumstantial evidence, that must be satisfied to permit a jury to infer that the person on trial was the person

Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

who committed the crime. Instead, the several federal appellate courts that have addressed this issue have generally employed an approach similar to a "totality of the circumstances" test. See, e.g., United States v. Ayala, 289 F.3d 16 (1st Cir. 2002); United States v. Bell, 166 F.3d 1201 (2d Cir. 1998)(unpublished); United States v. Tate, 163 F.3d 600 (4th Cir. 1998); United States v. Vahalik, 606 F.2d 99 (5th Cir. 1979); United States v. Weed, 689 F.2d 752 (7th Cir. 1982); United States v. Alexander, 48 F.3d 1477 (9th Cir. 1995); United States v. Chambliss, 267 F. App'x 870 (11th Cir. 2008). As a result, the judicial landscape does not seem uniform as circuit courts seem to differ in deciding which information may be used in determining if sufficient circumstantial evidence as to a defendant's identity was produced.

At least one circuit focused entirely on the defendant's behavior. In Butler v. United States, defendants Dodson Benedec, Sidney L. Schwarz, Robert Eakins, Leonard Ostrowsky, Jerome Stadin and Peter J. Wangberg (collectively, "the Benedec defendants") and eleven other defendants stood trial for mail fraud. Butler v. United States, 317 F.2d 249, 252 (8th Cir. 1963). At trial, the Benedec defendants' lawyer identified Eakins and Wangberg in his opening statement. Id. at 254. One witness under cross-examination identified Stadin. Id. None of

Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

the other Benedec defendants were directly identified. Id. At no point during the trial did the defendants or their lawyers make the question of identity an issue. Id. Raising identity as an issue for the first time on appeal, the Benedec defendants claimed the government failed to connect their names with the corporeal defendants on trial. See id. at 254. The Eighth Circuit held that the defendants "tacitly admitted their identity" in light of all the facts and circumstances, including the defense put on by the defendants. Id. at 254-255. The Court stated that "[i]t is inconceivable that these [Benedec defendants], individually or collectively, would have sat mute and subjected themselves to the ordeals of the lengthy trial if they had sincerely and in good faith believed they were being tried for an offense with which they were completely disassociated." Id.

Although the Eighth Circuit considered the defendant's failure to object and submission to trial as evidence of identity, see Butler, 317 F.2d at 254,² the Court is troubled by this approach. The Fifth Amendment protects a defendant's right to remain silent. U.S. Const. amend. V. It is axiomatic that a criminal defendant is under no obligation to put on any defense

² Although the Court recognizes that this case was decided in 1963, before the Supreme Court of the United States issued its opinion in Griffin, it has not been explicitly overruled.

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

at all. See, e.g., Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609, 615 (1965)("[T]he Fifth Amendment . . . forbids either comment by the prosecution on the accused's silence or instructions by the court that such silence is evidence of guilt.") This Court finds that Butler's approach is wholly inconsistent with that principle. Accordingly, this Court chooses not to follow Butler.

Other courts have determined that counsel's use of the term "defendant" during an examination, in conjunction with other evidence, was sufficient circumstantial evidence from which a jury could infer identity.

In United States v. Weed, 689 F.2d 752 (7th Cir. 1982), John Weed and his brother Leonard Weed were required to complete a customs form upon entry into the United States. Weed, 689 F.2d at 753-54. They were indicted after failing to declare certain amounts of currency on their customs form. Id. At trial, three government customs agents testified regarding statements John Weed ("Weed") made the day he had entered the United States. Id. at 754. The agents also testified regarding their search of Weed's luggage. Id. In the course of taking testimony, counsel for both the government and the defendant used Weed's name and "the defendant" interchangeably. Id. Defense counsel did not object to the prosecution's references to Weed as "the defendant." Id. No direct identification occurred at trial. Id.

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

at 755. At the conclusion of the evidence, Weed moved for a judgment of acquittal. Id. He was convicted at the trial court, and appealed to the Seventh Circuit. Id. at 754.

The Seventh Circuit noted that no direct identification had occurred. Weed, 689 F.2d at 754. At the same time, the Court held that identification could be inferred from all the facts and circumstances that were in evidence. Id. The Court specifically noted that none of the witnesses during trial had noted that the defendant was not the same Weed stopped by them on the day at issue. Id. at 755. The Court also took note of the fact that both the prosecution and the defense referred to the defendant on trial as John Weed, and that the defense never objected to the prosecution's references to "the defendant." Id. After considering the unobjected to interchangeable use of Weed's name and "the defendant" and the witnesses' failure to indicate Weed was not the man arrested, the Weed Court found that there was sufficient evidence to prove identity. Id. at 757.

Intuitively, the approach taken in Weed is logically sustainable. The prosecutor referred to the individual engaged in the acts alleged in the indictment as "the defendant" and "John Weed." Id. at 754. In the course of their testimony, the witnesses in Weed referred to the John Weed named in the

Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

indictment as "the defendant." Id. When an attorney first uses the term, "the defendant," in a question where no witness has identified the defendant, she makes a presumption about identity. That is, the attorney injects the otherwise unconnected and unidentified defendant in the courtroom into the subject or object of the inquiry. In context, the witness who responds to a question about "the defendant" necessarily lends relevance to, and acceptance of, the term "defendant." In doing so, the witness ties a person in the courtroom - "the defendant" - to the individual and conduct about which and whom that witness is testifying.

Still other courts have determined that competent evidence - such as witness testimony and physical exhibits admitted into evidence - is sufficient to infer identity. For example, in United States v. Ayala, 289 F.3d 16 (1st Cir. 2002), Rafael Ayala-Ayala ("Ayala"), Armando Torres-Ortiz ("Ortiz"), and others were tried for entering a military installation for a purpose prohibited by law. In that case, a police officer testified that he had detained the individuals named in the indictment. Id. at 25. The prosecutor had the officer look at photographs of the individuals who were alleged to have been detained the night of the incident. Id. The officer stated that he recognized the photographs, two of which were of Ortiz and

Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

Ayala respectively, as the photographs had been taken the night of the incident in his presence. Id. The Court admitted the photographs into evidence. Id. The United States failed to directly identify Ortiz and Ayala at trial. See id., 289 F.3d at 25. Thereafter, Ayala and Ortiz filed Rule 29 motions, arguing that there was insufficient evidence to support a finding that they were the individuals detained on the night in question. Id. The district court ruled that the identification was sufficient, finding that in-court identification was not required as long as there was evidence in the record showing that the person arrested was the person being accused. See Ayala, 289 F.3d at 25.

On appeal, the First Circuit found that the evidence adduced at trial was sufficient for identification purposes. Id. Specifically, the Court considered that: the officer testified that the individuals arrested on the night in question were those in the photographs; the photographs were entered in evidence; and counsel for Ayala and Ortiz indicated to the Court that "she was appearing on behalf of [Ortiz] and [Ayala]." *Id.*³

United States v. Haddow
Criminal No. 2012-35
Memo. Op.

This approach is logically sound. The trier-of-fact may certainly consider all things entered into evidence and draw inferences therefrom. Thus, in Ayala, the Court could have looked at the pictures of the individuals detained the night of the incident, compared them to Ayala and Ortiz, and reasonably concluded that two of the pictures depicted Ayala and Ortiz.⁴

The Court is persuaded that the appropriate approach to determine whether sufficient evidence exists for a jury to infer that David Haddow was identified is one that draws on the logical and contextual considerations endorsed in Weed. That approach also is implicitly underpinned by the well-established tenet that a jury may "make any reasonable inferences that can be drawn from the evidence." United States v. Elwell, 515 F. App'x 155, 163 (3d Cir. 2013). At its core, in the absence of any direct evidence, the issue before the Court is whether the utterances of counsel may permissibly be considered as part of the circumstantial evidence from which a jury may infer identity. That question requires some deliberation, as it is one of first impression for this Court.

There are two broad categories of such utterances. The first occurs when counsel argues or makes statements directly to the Court or jury. The second occurs when counsel examines a witness. It is clear that statements and "arguments of counsel are simply not evidence." United States v. Sandini, 888 F.2d 300, 311 (3d Cir. 1989). What is less clear is how to treat the second category of utterances. That is, those that prompt a witness's related response. The Court currently is unaware of any authority in the Third Circuit that directly addresses this issue. Even so, there are certain axioms that guide the Court in its treatment of such utterances. First, counsel's statements, such as questions on direct or cross-examination, are not made in a vacuum. Those questions are posed to witnesses, who may answer in any manner which is responsive to the question. In doing so, those witnesses provide competent evidence. The meaning and weight of such evidence is determined by the jury, as the jury is the ultimate judge of witness credibility and the trier of fact. See United States v. Scheffer, 523 U.S. 303, 336 (1998) (discussing the role of the jury). Thus, it is clear that counsel's predicate questions are considered by, and generate competent evidence from, a witness.

⁴ Ayala was a bench trial. As such, the trial judge acted as the trier-of-fact.

The Court must still determine what, if any, permissible evidentiary value is added by the utterances of counsel that occur when counsel questions a witness. The evidentiary value of such utterances is perhaps best demonstrated with a brief discussion of the manner in which evidence is adduced during cross-examination.

During cross-examination, an attorney may ask leading questions. Fed. R. Evid. 611. The use of leading questions, as permitted by the Federal Rules of Evidence, in essence allows a cross-examining attorney to testify, subject only to the witness's agreement or objection. See, e.g., Stine v. Marathon Oil Co., 976 F.2d 254, 266, 24 Fed. R. Evid. Serv. 78 (5th Cir. 1992) ("As we all are fully aware, any good trial advocate who is allowed leading questions can both testify for the witness and argue the client's case by the use of leading questions.") Leading questions are those questions which suggest the sought-after answer. Typically, in response, a witness need only say "yes" or "no." By answering the question, the witness does not necessarily indicate acceptance of the premise. However, by answering the question without objecting to its elemental underpinnings - such as the subject or object of the sentence - the witness adopts, at least, those elemental components of counsel's questions. Those elemental components, such as the subject or object of the sentence, necessarily and contextually become part of that witness's testimony.

Context is defined as the weaving together of words in a language to give them meaning. See Context, Webster's Third New

Memo. Op.

Int'l Dictionary (Merriam Webster 1993). Context is derived from the interrelated conditions in which something exists or occurs.

Id. A witness's "yes" or "no" response is given meaning by incorporating the contextual nest from which it was born. Were this Court to hold otherwise, the witness's answers would no longer be relevant, as a long list of "yes"es and "no"s without context does not tend to prove or disprove any material fact. See Fed. R. Evid. 401 (relevance). Linguistically, such an exchange would have little or no meaning.

The words used by counsel in their questions cannot be thought of as having meaning completely independent of the context in which those questions are asked. It would defy logic to find that jurors do not determine what the words in questions mean or refer to based on context.⁵

As such, the Court is persuaded that in considering the evidence, a jury may draw inferences from both the content of counsel's questions and the context which may give meaning to those questions.

⁵ Other courts have found so as well, though without explicitly explaining why. See, e.g., Weed, 689 F.2d at 754 (finding that interchangeable use of "the defendant," an individual assumed to be in the courtroom, and the name "John Weed" the name in the indictment, was circumstantial evidence that "the defendant" and "John Weed" were the same individual and the one witnesses were being questioned about.)

Here, Attorney Treston Moore introduced himself as counsel for David Haddow. In that capacity, he engaged in cross-examination of several witnesses. One such witness was Laura Cates ("Cates"). Attorney Moore introduced himself to Cates by stating: "I'm Treston Moore. I spoke with you. But I represent David Haddow." (July 9, 2013, Tr. 131:24-25, 132:1). A jury could reasonably infer that the individual Attorney Moore was referring to was the individual he had been conferring with and sitting near during trial. The jury could therefore conclude that when Attorney Moore referred to "David Haddow," as his client, that was the individual he was discussing.

After introducing himself to Cates, Attorney Moore began cross-examination. During the course of his cross-exam, the following exchange took place:

Q [Attorney Moore]. Did you take the documents to Mr. Haddow?

A [Laura Cates]. I don't, I don't recall.

Q. Do you recall whether or not Mr. Haddow signed them?

A. No, he did not.

Q. And do you recall why he didn't sign them?

MR. FOREMAN: Objection.

THE COURT: Sustained.

BY MR. MOORE:

Q. What, if anything, did you do with regard to the tax returns after Mr. Haddow did not sign them?

(July 9, 2013, Tr. 149:4-14). Cates's responses to Attorney Moore's questions did not alter the essential elements of them. That is, her response to those questions incorporated the essential elements of the questions - for example, the object (David Haddow) - into her answer.

From this exchange, it could be reasonably inferred that, as before, the "David Haddow" to which Attorney Moore was referring was the man at counsel's table. In answering Attorney Moore's questions, Cates incorporated them into her testimony. The line of questioning dealt specifically with the behavior alleged to be criminal in the indictment. Thus, this cross-examination created a link between the individual sitting in the courtroom and the individual named in the indictment.

Futhermore, at the beginning of trial, in his opening statement, Attorney Moore stated, "I'm Treston Moore. I am entirely honored to represent my client, Mr. David Haddow." (July 7, 2013, Trial Tr., 75:6-7.) This statement alone is not evidence. It does, though, create a link between the "client" - reasonably assumed to be the individual in communication with the attorney during trial - and the name "David Haddow." That is, this introduction creates a sort of dictionary in which the generalized name "David Haddow" is interchangeable with "Attorney Moore's client."

Thereafter, the name "David Haddow," and variations thereof, was used repeatedly by Attorney Moore in the course of cross-examining the Government's witnesses. During his cross-examination of Boschulte, Attorney Moore asked, "With regard to the work that you observed Mr. Haddow doing there, would you say it was a small or large amount of time?" (July 8, 2013, Trial Tr. 205.) Boschulte responded "Oh, the work that Mr. Haddow did? . . . A lot of the time." (Id.)

Also during the cross-examination, the following exchange occurred:

Q [Attorney Moore]. In a couple of the transactions that we referenced, you noted that you would receive instructions from either Mr. Haddow or Mr. Padilla, is that correct?

A [Boschulte]. Mr. Haddow or Mr. Questel.

(July 8, 2013, Trial Tr. 206). Boschulte thus adopted the essential elements of the question - that is "Mr. Haddow" as either the object or subject - into her answer. By testifying as to the actions taken by "Mr. Haddow," the witness linked the "Haddow," as defined by Attorney Moore, to the person and related conduct about which the witness testified.

Another witness, Questel, was asked by Attorney Moore if he had been recommended by "Mr. Haddow" for the position at Compass Diversified. (July 9, 2013, Tr. 73.) Questel responded "Yes." (Id.) Attorney Moore also inquired if "Mr. Haddow" had made approvals of certain programs. (Id. at 77.) Questal responded that "Mr. Haddow" had bought the program. (Id.) As before, these answers incorporated into them not only the object or subject of the question, "Mr. Haddow," but also the context which gave it meaning. The definition of "Mr. Haddow" as "Attorney Moore's client," linked the David Haddow in court to the person and related conduct about which the witness testified.

Finally, during his cross-examination of Padilla, Attorney Moore asked, "In Bailey 149, you sent to Mr. Haddow, October 10th 2006, a document for Mr. L-e-h-r, and you wanted this invoice to him to be dated December 15th, 2005, correct?" Padilla answered, "Correct." (July 10, 2013, Trial Tr. 54:20-23.) Again, the witness adopted Attorney Moore's question, including its object of "Mr. Haddow," and connected it to the individual charged in the indictment.

IV. CONCLUSION

"Words are but symbols for the relations of things to one another and to us[.]" Friedrich Nietzsche, Philosophy in the Tragic Age of the Greeks. The interrelatedness of words and the significance of context is not lost when a lawyer, using the English lexicon, examines a witness in Court. Indeed, it would be error to find that the words that give context to an attorney's question must be ignored. It would similarly be error to find that those words do not contribute to the circumstantial evidence adduced from a witness's answer. Thus, an attorney's utterances to a witness may be considered as part of the circumstantial evidence that a jury may consider in determining if the government has met its burden of proof.

Considering the total quantum and quality of the oral circumstantial evidence adduced at trial, and viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to the government, the Court finds it cannot grant the relief Haddow seeks.

Indeed, despite the Government's utter failure to provide any direct evidence of identity, there was not a complete absence of evidence. To the contrary, there were several pieces of circumstantial evidence that the David Haddow in the courtroom was the same David Haddow alleged to have committed the offenses charged. The Court finds that a rational jury could find proof of Haddow's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.⁶

⁶ While the Court finds that Rule 29 relief is not appropriate, the identity issue that arose in this case warrants a brief comment. It is well established that the identity of the defendant is an important facet of proving any crime. Given the consequences of a criminal proceeding, even the identity of witnesses against the accused is of paramount importance. In fact, this Court has previously addressed the grave importance of ensuring the identity of those testifying in a trial.

In United States v. Edwards, CRIM. 2010-36, 2011 WL 5834241 (D.V.I. Nov. 18, 2011) the government proffered a witness who purported to be "Troy Willock." In fact, that witness used not only a name, but also a birthdate and social security number that belonged to another individual. Id. The failure to discover and disclose the uncertainty surrounding "Troy Willock's" identity deprived the defense of an opportunity to investigate, pre-trial, a key government witness who very well may have had some underlying deficiencies. To be sure, the circumstances of Edwards are not identical to those present here. However, they do underscore the importance of identity.

Given the importance of identification, the Government's complete failure to adduce any direct evidence as to Haddow's identity, after calling thirteen witnesses to testify, confounds the Court. While the identity of a witness is significant, the identity of a defendant is the sine qua non of a criminal prosecution.

The Court hastens to remind the Government that the burden of proof in all criminal cases is on the Government. See In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 361-62 (1970). The Government is constitutionally mandated to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, each of the elements of the alleged crime. See id. This constitutional protection is guaranteed to all citizens, and is something that the Court takes very seriously. It is troubling that the Government was apparently not so concerned in this instance.
